Maud Granger's Engagement.

Maud Granger's new play "Gabriel," in which she is to appear at the Opera House, Thursday evening, is said to offer her the strongest emotional role she has ever appeared in. When the lustre-eyed Maud's success in "Gabriel," "Corra," "Frou Frou" and roles of that calibre is taken into consideration, that is saying a great deal. No little interest is being evinced in the fair Granger's coming. Miss Granger is exceedingly popular with the ladies, and the female contingent will be out in full force. As well as being a famous beauty, Miss Granger is also celebrated for being the best dressed of American artists. Her costumes are always a revelation to enthusiastic femininity. There is a large demand for seats for her engagement.

WOODSON ACQUITTED.

The Jury Takes only a Short time to Decide it.

THE VERDICT LOUDLY APPLAUDED.

An Affecting Scene in the Court when the Decision is Announced. The Prisoner's own Story told on the Stand Yesterday—Other Evidence for the Defense—A Benefit for Lafe.

The Circuit Court opened promptly yesterday morning with Judge Paul on the bench. The examination of Harry Chapline was continued, but nothing new was developed.

Harry Hoffner, of Fairview, testified to having been present in the saloon during the trouble. He heard, but did not see a blow struck, but it sounded as if made by some kind of a weapon, and not with the hand or fist.

Captain Delbrugge and Killian Bader described the condition of Fleming's face, as having had the appearance of being badly beaten up.

The prosecution rested its case, and the witnesses for the defense were put on the stand. T. B. Dolan was asked about the rules of his saloon. This question was objected to by the State, and the objection sustained. Woodson himself was then placed on the stand, and related the occurrences preceding the death of Fleming.

THE PRISONER'S STORY.

He said that between three and four o'clock on the morning of the 22d of June Thomas Fleming came into Dolan's saloon, where Woodson was employed, went into the back room, sat on a chair, placed his head on a table and went to sleep. He went up to him, shook him by the shoulder and told him it was against the rules. He went back to his work and soon noticed that Fleming had gone to sleep again. He roused him and again told him it was against the rules. Fleming answered: "The hell you say!" and composed himself to sleep again. A third time he was roused, and then asked Woodson for some tobacco. Woodson said he had some back of the bar, and Fleming asked him to bring it to him. Woodson replied: "You've got a gall, asking a man to bring you tobacco." Fleming responded: "Go to hell," and rising from his chair, struck at Woodson with a cane held in his hand, following it up with a second blow. Woodson struck him once in the face with his fist, following it up with a second blow with the open hand, Fleming falling. Woodson caught him by the shoulders, and as he fell dragged him out of the saloon, leaving him in a sitting position on the pavement. Fleming then lolled over on the pavement, as a drunken man would.

Drs. Hildreth, Wilson and Baird testified as to the theory of the effects of the unrestrained use of intoxicating liquors on the system, also as to the probability of the wounds on Fleming's face and head causing death.

THE ARGUMENT.

In his speech to the jury Prosecuting Attorney Howard admitted that the State had not proved enough to justify a verdict of murder in the first degree, but also claimed that it had proved either murder in the second degree or voluntary manslaughter. He claimed that the only theory on which Woodson could be acquitted was that the blood vessel in Fleming's brain had burst prior to the blows delivered by the defendant. This theory Mr. Howard characterized as absurd and utterly untenable. He asked for a verdict of murder in the second degree, and claimed that it could not be less than voluntary manslaughter.

Capt. Dovenor, in a speech of about an hour, closely analyzed the evidence, and claimed that the State had no leg to stand on. He claimed that the blood vessel in Fleming's brain had burst prior to the blows delivered by Woodson; that Fleming's former condition was such, brought on by the indulgence in intoxicating liquors, that it was perfectly evident that the slight blows delivered by Woodson had not caused his death.

Colonel Arnett, of course, disputed what Capt. Dovenor said. He objected to the jury "presuming" too much, and showed them their duty was to go by the evidence alone. He called particular attention to the brutal way Fleming had been beaten, by the testimony of Capt. Delbrugge and others, and showed that this testimony did not agree with what would be the case were Woodson's story true.

A VERDICT OF NOT GUILTY.

After Colonel Arnett had ceased speaking, Judge Paul delivered his charge to the jury. It was in the nature of the ordinary charge in a trial for murder and occupied but a short time. The jury filed out of the box and retired to the jury room just at fifteen minutes to six o'clock. At this time they repaired to supper, and returned to their room at half past seven. At a quarter to eight word was sent that a verdict had been arrived at, and at ten minutes to eight the jury returned. Prosecuting Attorney Howard was not present, and Clerk Mitchell proceeded with the usual routine.

Shortly before the jury had arrived, the defendant, accompanied by his wife and two of her lady friends had taken seats within the bar. When the jury was seated Clerk Mitchell asked if they had arrived at a verdict. "We have," was the response of the foreman. Woodson was ordered to stand up, and had arisen to an almost erect position, when the words "Not Guilty" came from the foreman's mouth. He straightened up erect, a bewildered, but glad smile brightened his face, and embracing his wife, who threw herself into his arms, he pressed her to his breast. His little girl, who had not seemed, during the trial, to realize the grave possibility impending over her father, seeing them embracing, ran up and was closely hugged by her father. The verdict was received with loud applause on the part of the audience, which was quickly hushed when Judge Paul indignantly commanded order.

Woodson, who was now a free man, was warmly congratulated by his friends, who crowded up to shake hands with him. He in turn shook hands with the jurymen, and thanked them for their action. The verdict seems to have met the approval of the public, as it was the universal opinion that the death of Thomas Fleming was due to accidental circumstances, entirely beyond the control of the defendant.

During her stay in Wheeling Mrs. Woodson has been the guest of Mrs. Gillespie, of East Wheeling. The house was the scene last night of the happy meeting of the once more reunited little family.

On Friday evening a benefit will be given to Mr. Woodson by the "Irishman's Love" company, which shows at the Grand Opera House the last three nights of the week.
